Why do we need your help? Making life better for children is our mission

Here's a patient at Children's Medical Center.

In December 2013, Julia was under a towering stack of blankets with only her face visible. Insertion of her port for chemotherapy had caused septic shock. In addition to septic shock, Julia sustained several fevers and had to be hospitalized for a nearly 70 days. She had eight days of cranial radiation and many days of chemotherapy. Eight months later, the 9-year-old is joking and telling stories about the care she received in the Pauline Allen Gill Center for Cancer and Blood Disorders at Children's Medical Center. The excellent level of care Children's offers was constantly brought to bear in her fight against leukemia – and it pulled her through.

Julia and many more children like her need your help.

About Children's Health

Children's Health sees more than 850,000 patients each year.

No child is turned away regardless of the family's ability to pay.

Children are given birthday parties, get to meet clowns, and have fun with animals, to make their time in the hospital easier.
